A benchmark study of the most recent RISC-V and ARMv8 architectures In a first-of-its-kind benchmark of these two instruction set architectures (ISAs), a team of researchers in Germany has performed a comprehensive evaluation of the most recent RISC-V ISA and ARMv8 ISA. In the study, which is published in the journal BMC Systems Biology, the researchers tested the performance of RISC-V and ARMv8 microprocessors in ten different microbenchmark applications—including memory-intensive functions—and compared the results with the performance of existing microprocessors and with the performance of a custom RISC-V chip. The benchmarking was performed on two x86-compatible servers (Intel Xeon E5-2640 v4 and Intel Xeon E5-1607 v4) in the same system. The researchers observed the ARMv8 architecture to be slower than RISC-V in several applications, including the SPEC CPU2017 integer benchmarks. In contrast, RISC-V was faster in integer-heavy applications such as maximum function, Sieve of Eratosthenes, and lookup. In addition, the researchers found that RISC-V was faster in some floating-point benchmarks. "With the notable exception of integer-heavy benchmarks, RISC-V performs better than ARMv8," the researchers write. "We believe this stems from the clear architectural advantage that RISC-V brings, such as pipelining, out-of-order execution, and load/store, as well as the fact that the code for RISC-V is easier to optimize." The researchers also performed an evaluation of
