How to log in? As mentioned before, you have to be in the same group as your co-workers. To join a group, you first have to make sure you are logged on the same network as your friends. Secondly, you have to choose the account you are going to connect with. The extension supports the following platforms: LinkedIn, Gmail, GSuite, Facebook, Twitter, Microsoft, and O365. If you have an account on any of these services, you can use it to log in. How does it work? Well, for the wheel to be spun, some participants have to make a request. That can be done by clicking the New Request button. After the request is in, the wheel spins, selecting the loser, which then has to go out and bring every other participant's coffee. Easy as pie, considering there won't be any arguments on who's going to do what. Some more features If you have a favorite coffee to go with each day, you can use the Preferences tab to set up a favorite type. By doing that, you automatically inform the colleague who needs to get it about your preference, eliminating the need to type it down in the chat. Besides this, there are a couple of notifications and sound effects that you may find useful for your requests. Furthermore, if you navigate over the Lab tab, you'll find a function that can remind you when to sit or stand up from your desk, in case you lose track of time and forget to move around. Also, from within the same tab, you can activate a function that will accept all requests, even if you are not at your desk. In conclusion, Office Spinner seems like a fun extension that can transform coffee chores into a game. Make a request, wait for the wheel to spin, and, if you are not the loser, just sit back and wait for your cup.
