Features of Photoshop The Photoshop interface makes a world of difference between learning and the experience of using Photoshop. In many cases, newcomers will spend months slowly learning the basics of the program before becoming productive. Photoshop features four windows: The Layers Window, which is used for Layers (color, monochrome, or black and white). Multiple layers can be layered on top of each other, making this window quite a useful feature. The Photoshop canvas window, which allows you to drag and drop layers. Layers can be resized, moved, reordered, and painted on top of other layers. The Selections window, which allows you to select specific features such as objects, brushes, or paint. The History window, which stores all changes you make in Photoshop so you can undo and redo your work. Photoshop's image processing tools are the same in their function as they were when Photoshop was first created in 1990. However, the basic Photoshop tools are more advanced than in other image editing programs, providing more functions and better workability. The basic tools are: Burn - A setting that colors an entire layer red Clear - A setting that removes all the color within a specific area Dodge - A setting that removes a specific color Gaussian Blur - A setting for blurring objects in your image to make them more appealing Hue - A setting that changes colors in the image into different colors Lighten - A setting that changes the brightness of a specific area Remove - A setting that removes a specific color from a specific area Screen - A setting that changes the tint of a specific color Sharpen - A setting for turning a dark area into a brighter one Smooth - A setting that removes speckles from an image Saturation - A setting that changes the brightness and hue of an image Vignette - A setting for adding a glow to an image Warm - A setting that changes the temperature of a specific color White - A setting that changes white to a specific color Garnish - A setting that adds glitter to a specific area Scripture Scripture Scripture is a feature that Photoshop has implemented since CS6, which adds many more shortcut keys to the Photoshop tool set. A photo released by South Korean government broadcaster KBS June 4, 2014 shows North Korean leader Kim Jong Un talks to a military officer during his field guidance at an undisclosed location. Kim supervised military units on the country's eastern coast to strengthen command of the armed forces. Photograph taken from KBS' "Kimilsungia" programme. KBS/AFP/Getty North Korean television broadcasts are regularly screened in the South as part of an ongoing campaign, including on giant outdoor screens. A recent show featured Kim Jong Un inspecting a military unit and the country's rockets, but the programme came with a warning to South Koreans not to be fooled by its digital presentation. The news is just a year after the two Koreas established a direct hotline and communications link between their militaries after years of diplomacy that led to the first inter-Korean summit in more than a decade. "In recent years, reports from the North about South Korea's military are repeatedly broadcast," a narrator says in the report featuring footage of the visit. "This is a message from the North Korean military counterattack unit, the tactful and professional North Korean military." The film was prepared in May and aired on June 1, North Korean state media agency KCNA reported. It was shown at the start of the month to mark the 69th anniversary of the military's founding, according to an official at the Unification Ministry in Seoul. The warning of military campaigns comes just months after news of the North's human rights record and threats towards its neighbours. Its leader has been in power for 11 years, since his father Kim Jong Il died in 2011. North Korea maintains a robust propaganda machine that includes newspapers, television, radio and museums, with songs and documentaries portraying the country in a positive light. US President Barack Obama and Kim Jong Un. Photograph: Reuters However, the state's media has been noticeably quiet about the country's continuing nuclear tests, which have angered Washington and its allies, and have drawn international sanctions and threats of a military response from the UN. One reason for this is that North Korea's propaganda teams work harder on the Korean peninsula than on foreign soil, according to former North Korean defector Han Sang-ho, who now runs a website that aims to educate people in North Korea. North Korea also seeks to use its propaganda teams abroad to build support for its domestic agenda, by highlighting its human rights record, he said. "[North Korea's propagandists

Young boys at the best school in Germany are being taught that pleasure is sinful and that "good girls don't do that." Though aged only between 14 and 18, children attending the "Kinderschule" at an elite Catholic school in Germany are being taught that enjoyment and self-gratification are sinful, and that girls who wear short skirts, use drugs and drink alcohol are "bitchy" and "whores," according to a shocking new report. The report by Duk Gee, an education watchdog group in Germany, claims that staff at the high school in the west German city of Düsseldorf who teach from a Catholic school curriculum are failing to have "correct attitudes towards the human body" with sex and violence being taught "as acceptable forms of entertainment." One boy is reportedly being forced to learn about "violent sex" with a doll while another has to learn about sex in the context of paedophilia and incest, the report claims. Another pupil at the school is reportedly being taught about Viagra and that "girls are there for guys to use them, even if they have a boyfriend." Females attending the school are reportedly also taught that "to look sexy, a girl needs to 'put herself on display,'" and are being exposed to porn and photographs of the "sexual adventures of other pupils." The Düsseldorf priest who supposedly administers the curriculum at the school, Father Angelus Rusche, allegedly claims that the teachers' activities are "normal" because children are becoming increasingly "demoralized" over time by exposure to media and technology. Father Angelus Rusche is a regular in the pages of the German media, frequently appearing on network television. He was reportedly caught performing "oral sex" on an altarboy at the school in 2010. The priest was suspended from his job for two years after the incident. "The school is one of the best in Germany. Its curriculum is examined by the Council of Europe and the International Baccalaureate Organization. Furthermore, the school regularly meets the top-level requirements set out by the German state education agency," the report claims. "However, there is a problem with the school's approach to the 'human body' ♦
