Download-jamie-foxx-unpredictable-album-zip-freeThe invention relates to a decoder for determining and generating binary signals when reading a data code having groups of data elements and having mixed signs and/or signs having different widths, wherein the data elements of the different groups are respectively assigned a position relative to a main axis of the data code and at least two, but not necessarily the same, reference positions relative to at least one sub-axis. In a decoder for reading a data code which has an asymmetrical arrangement of data elements in the main axis and sub-axis, it is important for the position of the data elements relative to the sub-axis in order to be unambiguously determined. For example, in the case of data codes according to the ISO 8613 format (see international patent application WO 93/19117), the main and sub-axes comprise two lines of marks and the data elements are assigned positions relative to the axes by a location code. In this format, the data elements are in groups having the same sign. The location code is formed by a binary word, the length of which is equal to the length of the group of data elements. When reading such a data code, it is known to use a set of reference marks in order to unambiguously assign the data elements. Such reference marks are used to determine the position of the data elements and, at least as far as possible, they are identical to the marks in the data code in order to permit a correlation between reference marks and data elements. In the case of codes according to the ISO 8613 format, the reference marks are used to find the main and sub-axes of the data code and to find the location code. The known decoder requires a number of reference marks which is dependent on the length of the data code and these 3e33713323
