Photoshop has gotten a lot more than a face-lift since its release in 1998. SEE ALSO: 20 Photoshop Tricks That Pro Photo Editors Need The powerful image editing software has evolved to include layers, color channels and vector tools, as well as features for retouching or other photo editing that weren't available at the beginning of the program. Despite Photoshop's ability to edit anything that looks like a picture – with the exception of live action footage – the program is really only suited for still photos. Do be warned, however, that Photoshop's power can be intimidating. It is a big beast of an application that will chew through the storage on your computer – especially if you make use of the Photoshop features that allow you to manipulate photos and videos. Bottom line: Photoshop is awesome. Share this article Link copied. Updated on December 6, 2015, at 8:46 AM CDT: This article has been updated to reflect a new release of Photoshop. The validity of the new American Joint Committee on Hypertension classification and treatment guidelines was tested in a community-based sample of 602 patients with prevalent hypertension. On the basis of this sample, cut-point levels were estimated, and the validity of the classification was studied by sensitivity, specificity and predictive values. The presence of cardiovascular disease and the use of drugs were used as the criterion variables of the treatment effect. The validity of the classification was examined in a clinical sample of 186 newly diagnosed patients with incident hypertension. The prevalence of cardiovascular disease was 63.5%. The classification validity was high when the presence of disease and use of drugs were the criterion variables, regardless of classification cut-point, though the sensitivity and predictive values were low. It was low when a cardiovascular event was used as a criterion variable. The estimated sensitivity and specificity of the classification were 78.5 and 72.9%, respectively. The classification had a low predictive value and its sensitivity and specificity were dependent on classification cut-point. The sensitivity and specificity of the classification in a sample with a high prevalence of cardiovascular disease is only moderate. The classification does not seem to be feasible as a tool for the general practitioner in a real clinical situation. [The immunogenicity of plasmid DNA encoding HBsAg vaccine is enhanced by a mixture of helper molecules]. The immunogenicity of pDNA encoding hepatitis B surface antigen (HBsAg) was enhanced by a mixture of helper molecules, such as polyethylene glycol (PEG)-6000 and nuclease. PEG-6000 was added into pDNA solution to swell the DNA into microparticles, which were further incubated with nuclease to expose the DNA ends. Then, the mixture was injected intramuscularly into BALB/c mice. After boosting immunization, the serum anti-HBsAg antibody titer and lymphocytes proliferation in the splenocyte were determined. The results showed that the expression of HBsAg was significantly increased in the group treated with PEG-6000 and nuclease. The expression was almost eliminated in the group treated with PEG-6000 and nuclease without DNA. Furthermore, the humoral immune responses were dramatically enhanced as compared to those observed with pDNA encoding HBsAg alone. The immune enhancement was related to the rate of uptake of pDNA by the cells, and the overall length of the pDNA. The mixture of PEG-6000 and nuclease could enhance immunogenicity of pDNA encoding HBsAg in vivo.

The Dental Hygiene Program and its Impact in Spain. In Spain, a new regulation (Royal Decree 6/2012) regarding dental hygienists was established. The aim of this document is to provide a better quality and safer work environment for dental professionals. It aims to direct the national dental hygiene in occupational health and hygiene issues. This article describes a program of the Occupational Health Department of the School of Dentistry of Murcia (Spain) regarding dental hygiene, which includes dental hygienists, secretarial personnel, and dentists. The program was developed following the recommendations of WHO and the Euromed Initiative. Currently, dental hygienists perform 80% of all dental hygiene procedures in primary care dental clinics. In the future, we expect that this percentage will increase. Our impression is that the quality of care provided will be improved by educating the dental hygienists and by their systematic participation.
