Photothermographic materials form black images upon exposure to light and have been used as microphotographic and medical photosensitive materials. As a practical advantage of black silver, the image tone is not affected by the ambient light, and further, any plastic materials can be used as support of the material because the heat-development causes no deterioration of the support, unlike in the case of the direct thermal-development method in which the support and/or photosensitive material is made of organic materials. Various methods have heretofore been proposed in order to obtain such black images. One of them is the method of forming a silver image by providing a photosensitive layer containing, for example, a photosensitive silver halide, a reducible silver salt, and a silver halide solvent on a base, and, after exposure, developing the photosensitive layer with a developing solution to form a silver image. In such a method, it is necessary to control the silver content 3da54e8ca3
