Title: Enter your title for the document; this title will appear in the menu bar and on the printed printout. File Size: This drop-down menu lets you specify the image's file size in pixels. The default setting, 72dpi, means that each pixel in the image is 72 dots per inch. When you enter a higher resolution, such as 300dpi, that's the number of dots per inch in the image. The higher the resolution, the more pixels are in the image, and the bigger the image. Resolution: See the sidebar "Choosing the right resolution," earlier in this chapter. The menu offers a huge range of different bitmap file formats, including Photoshop's own standard file format (PSD), as well as JPEG, GIF, TIFF, Portable Network Graphics (PNG), and Windows Imaging Format (WIM) files. Background Color: Click this box to pick a background color. The Color Picker control (the color wheel icon, shown in the margin) appears, where you can select a color. Background: Use this drop-down menu to choose between `Grayscale`, which shows black and white, or `RGB`, which shows the colors red, green, and blue in varying intensities. Dither: This option controls the amount of dither that's added to the image when it's saved in the file format of your choice (see "Choosing the right resolution," earlier in this chapter, for more on the difference between Grayscale and RGB images). Lower the setting here and you get more pixelation, but more colors. Higher levels of dither produce smoother images. Personally, I like the medium setting. Don't let it get too high because you can introduce artifacts into the image. The Print dialog box, shown in Figure 5-8, presents you with a number of options. These include: Print size: Click to change the printer's paper size. The larger the paper size, the bigger the paper. You can also use the paper type drop-down menu to preview the paper on your printer and choose Postcard, Letter, Legal, A4, or A3 size. Just like the photo paper settings on the Monitor preferences, bigger will produce a bigger image. Printer: Change
