I think I wrote it well, but maybe I might not have. As a new user, I ask new users to tell me if there is anything I have done in a manner that is not clear. I know that new users can't have edit privileges, but this is not meant to be an edit, rather some feedback on the question that I think might be unclear (I know there is a similar question, but it was before I asked this one). A: I don't see anything else that is unclear about the question. In a very general sense, most questions will be about something. What that thing might be (or how to do something) varies quite a bit. Sometimes the question is not about anything specific at all. You could ask a question of "How do I make a pie?", and simply not provide any context for how you came to know that you should make a pie, or what you want to do with it. That's not what you're asking here. That said, a question of "how do I make a pie?" is not a question about the utility of what you're doing or intending, but a question about the mechanics of baking a pie. And this is fine, because it's programming related. It's not opinionated, but it's not so broad and abstract that it's nothing about what you want it to be about. At the same time, the question being on topic means that you need to consider things related to the topic 648931e174

An initial angiographic study, in 15 patients, showed no anatomic abnormalities distal to the right inguinal ligament. The clinical manifestations of the disease were markedly variable. Thus, three of these patients had massive urinary tract embolisms, one had left lower limb ischemia, and seven had vague symptoms, such as fatigability and impotence, and were referred for possible aorto-iliac surgery. Of the three patients undergoing surgery, one had frank ischemia due to thrombosis and two had abdominal hemorrhages secondary to necrosis of the aneurysms. The postoperative course was uncomplicated in all three patients, and there was a prompt return of vigor, sexual activity, and ambulation in two of the three. There was no evidence of lower extremity amputation. The two patients who were not operated on died within 11 to 15 months, respectively, from recurrence of the disease and from metastatic carcinoma
