1 Import Images When selecting an image you must choose the right program for your needs. A lot of beginner's get caught up in compatibility and the issue of image types. Don't worry about compatibility. If you are using Windows, Photoshop will be your program of choice. If you are downloading a JPEG you need to be using Photoshop CS3 or above. If you are using a TIFF or other uncompressed file, Photoshop 7.0 or above. If you are using a RAW file, Photoshop Lightroom is what you are looking for. This is basically going to be a tutorial for Lightroom. The number one thing that needs to be done when you download a new image is to select where you want it to end up. This is done by opening up the image in Photoshop and loading the file. 2 Open Images Next, you need to select the "New File" option. Click "Open" and select the folder where you are going to store the image. 3 Open Settings Next, click on the settings icon in the upper right of the screen. This will bring up a window that allows you to name your image, set its resolution, and crop the image. Setting your resolution is crucial to being able to process large images in a reasonable amount of time. If you have a folder full of images and most of them are 5k or higher in resolution, you will likely need a minimum of a 2.0 gigapixel file to be able to handle it. If you have a lot of smaller images you should probably stay below a 1.0 gigapixel limit. If you are new to Photoshop and setting the resolution can be tricky, try this: Resize at 100% Set the resolution to 800 pixels per inch Crop to the area you want. Make a selection with the pen tool that goes around the area you want to keep. After cropping, save your image as a JPEG. 4 Crop Once you have saved your image, you can begin to edit the image. This will be covered in detail in the "Crop" section. 5 Open Layers Next, you need to open a layer for each of the different areas of the image. This is very helpful when it comes to undoing mistakes. When you are done your image should look something like this:

What happened next was panic. The networks picked up the story, the mass media rushed to print the story, but by the time the dust had settled more than two and a half years later, the entire Internet was buzzing with evidence, and more than a few people were pretty sure that they had seen a UFO. Here's how it all went down. The night before, a network camera in the Florida Everglades had picked up a strange rock and is now known to have recorded a fascinating split second of time in which a bright object slid around to point directly over the cam, briefly creating a visible corridor on the lens' film. To most people in the immediate area, though, it was just a cool piece of footage of an alligator or a raccoon. But the more people paid attention, the more they realized they had seen something that was highly unusual. What made the footage most eerie, however, was not the fact that a bright orb had literally appeared and vanished in front of the lens, but that another, identical orb had appeared directly above the first, casting a glowing trail of its own through the trees. The writer Jeremy Baum and a researcher named John F. Schuessler discovered the footage on their night-vision cameras on July 22, 2000. They watched the two orbs appear above the cameras and vanished without a sound. The following morning, the pair took a closer look at the original video footage and came to a startling conclusion: The lights appeared at exactly the same time for both images. After some more close inspection, Baum and Schuessler determined that the flickerings were in the shape of a UFO and that the two objects had entered the frame exactly 15.5 seconds apart. Baum contacted the network that had broadcast the footage the previous night and asked them to send a representative to take another look at it. All he got was a form letter thanking him for his opinion and offering to send him a copy of the story that the network had eventually run. Frustrated, Baum and Schuessler decided to catch up with their respective bosses the following day, where they saw that their footage was running on the same news programs as the story from the previous night. At that point, Baum, who'd worked for five years as a programmer at NBC, decided to go public with the footage. He wrote a letter to the network executives that night, attaching the clip, and also contacted the writer of
