If a USpendingSMS message is received for a user who has destroyed a message, the USMS receiver will receive a 415 (Unsupported Media Type) response and log the message accordingly (as a ClientIntentResult.unsupported for the corresponding intent). How does a social network like Facebook handle these messages? Does Facebook receive the message, realize that the target is in a deleted state, and request a re-send of the message? If the server receives the message, will it have the user's permission to re-send the message? A: Regarding your question about Facebook: They receive the unread messages in their inbox and then send a request to their users to resend the message and then delete the message themselves. (This is made possible by the fact they use their own SMS Client.) See this

A question was posted a few days ago that purported to be a "purely about black people" question but was really asking about "white people", including "white people in the US". I voted to close this question but it was eventually reopened after much debate and community interest. Many people have commented on the topic, including @Mehwish, @André, @Hugo and @Gregory, and suggested that we have policy questions about this. I've voted to close this question in part because I disagree with the suggested policy and in part because I am not expert enough in the topic to provide an answer on whether the question should be closed. A: I think it should remain open, and in fact be a community wiki answer with a descriptive title. That way, it is not completely closed off and the information it contains is there for anyone who may find themselves in a similar situation. However, I also don't think we should answer questions when it becomes apparent that the OP is only interested in questions about "white people" and has no interest in interacting with other users. When a question is closed because it is solely about a specific demographic group, and the question is answered, we remove all of the answers because we don't want to be spreading misinformation. Thus, we have to determine when the OP is actually interested in answering questions with an international audience and not just about "white people" in the US. I think if this were to remain open, we could then reopen the question as a community wiki once the OP had added any information about the broader topic. Stable, monodisperse and well-defined nickel nanoclusters formed by oxidation of Ni(+) complexes on mesoporous TiO₂. The formation and assembly of Ni(n) complexes on TiO(2) mesoporous films with different structural features were investigated. The Ni(n) complexes with n = 1-6 were prepared by the reaction of Ni(+) with sulfanilic acid. The sulfonate
