Note that Photoshop isn't the only program available for image editing. There are many other applications that you can use that either include all of Photoshop's features or some of Photoshop's features. In fact, quite a few of the major image-editing applications available today contain Photoshop's raw file format support. ## Getting Started with Photoshop Photoshop can be intimidating at first if you haven't used a graphics-editing program before, but starting small is a good way to ease into the system. You can zoom in on a picture to see the photo at a much larger size than the default view in Photoshop. The smaller picture size makes it easy to work on the detail of the picture and be more aware of what you see. While Photoshop can be intimidating on first glance because of its extensive features, in fact, the program is quite easy to use. Beginners can typically accomplish a number of common editing tasks with little problem. In general, you can control most changes to a picture via the tools that Photoshop offers, such as brushes, filters, layers, and controls. As well as giving you unlimited ways to edit a photo, Photoshop has a variety of helpful tools, such as how to crop photos, apply a filter, and adjust brightness, saturation, contrast, and so on. When you open a photo, you have the option of choosing how many _layers_ (the basic building blocks of a photo) you want to edit. A single-layer photo has only one layer. A double-layer photo has two layers. A triple-layer photo has three layers, and so on. Each layer has its own unique properties, including the settings that you set for that layer. As you can tell by the terms _layers,_ and _positions,_ a double-layer photo consists of two layers in different places of a photo — each with its own settings and properties. Photoshop has tools that enable you to perform a variety of modifications. For example, you can color correct images, add special effects, and crop photos. You can also cut and paste photos, resize images, and perform a wide range of other tasks. ## Exploring the Essential Controls Photoshop provides two main tools for modifying pictures: Tools and the Layers palette. The Tools you use include various tools to change the way a photo looks and modify certain areas of a photo. The Layers palette organizes your layers and enables you to modify their properties

Q: How do I avoid getting duplicate matches when using a free-standing function in a regex? I'm using regex to search for strings across many lines. The problem I'm having is when I'm using a free-standing function, the regex only returns one match, and that's the first instance where it's found. However, if I use an inline function, it returns all instances where it finds an instance of that function. For example, this is the inline function: const testRegex = /(foo|bar|hello)/gi; console.log(testRegex.exec('blahblahfoo')); This is the free-standing function: const testRegex = /(foo|bar|hello)/gi; const findFun = (x) => x.match(testRegex); console.log(findFun('blahblahfoo')); A: You're looking for the positive lookahead. It's lazy but gives you all the matches within a given string, by using the following regex: (?= foo|bar|hello) A: I can see two issues here: You seem to be looking for a general matched position in a given line. To do that, you want to use /foo/gi This will return every instance of the foo. To only match them in the first instance, you can use ^foo/gi Note that this will only return an even number of matches. If you want to match every instance, you can replace the /i or /g options with /m and it will return exactly one match per line. You're also using the results of a string match to generate a regex which is very dangerous. You can't simply say "if the string matches this pattern, return this result", instead you will have to use.match() again. E.g. const foo = "foo"; const match = new RegExp("foo", "i"); const result = testRegex.exec("blahblahfoo"); You're then using the result of that match to generate a new regex. Don't do this! You've now created a situation where the next iteration will not stop until you have run out of resources. Instead you need to use a variable: const regex = testRegex;
